Should Britain stay in the EU?

Ever since David Cameron has been prime minister, there has been much discussion about whether or not we should remain in the EU. This controversy has sparked debate all over the country due to the consequences if we leave or if we stay.

One of the main reasons why people think we should leave the EU, is that as a member we must pay the membership fees and it costs a substantial amount of money. As well as this, we have to obey the laws of the EU and if we left, Britain will have more choice and control over their country. This would be beneficial due to migrants coming across the borders of Britain and us choosing whether we want to allow them into our country.

Alternatively, some people think we should stay because Britain is more powerful as we're part of an influential club. This is because we have more of a say in what other members of the EU can do that could affect us. If we do remain in the EU, we have more power to affect our future if we remain in the EU.

On the other hand, people say we should brexit because if other EU countries have financial problems we must support them by giving them some of our money. This affects us because of the amounts we provide them with. If we leave we will become a richer country and have less risk of having financial problems.

Though, people think that we should stay because we are not part of the passport-free travel zone like most other EU members. This means we still have control over who visits Britain. Also, immigration makes us more money or Britain than it costs. This would have a great affect on Britain.

In conclusion, after hearing both sides of the argument, we think that we should leave the EU so that we have more control over our borders and less chance of problems. This would make us a better country and definitely more independant and strong.
